Sitefinity vs. Open Source

With the world of web design and development in a constant state of change, it almost feels impossible to keep up with website best practices.

What's best for your website and business today, could easily change tomorrow, and again the day after that.

Let's explore some key factors in web development...

Ownership

One of the main differences between Sitefinity and an Open Source solution is who owns or manages the system.

Open source CMS

You own and are responsible for updating the site

Proprietary CMS

You license it out and all updating and responsibilities are taken care of for you

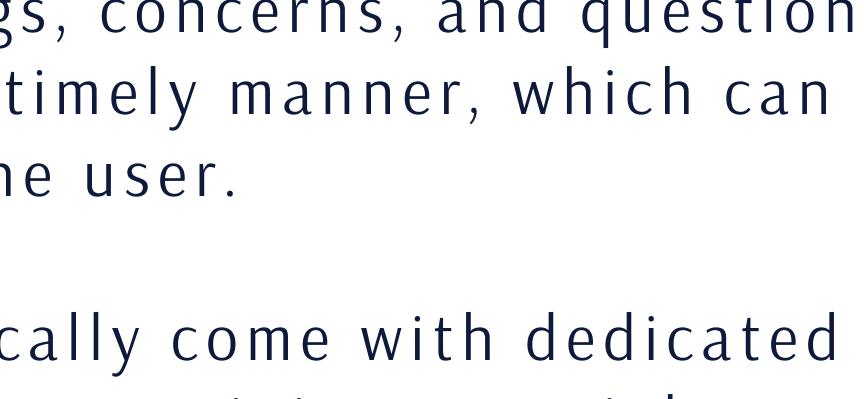

Investment

Though Open Source solutions appear more finance-friendly up front, they could actually cost your business more over time.

Sitefinity may appear to typically have a larger up front investment, but that entirely depends on your business.

Many businesses agree that the investment in a proprietary solution like Sitefinity is typically worth it, for a variety of reasons:

What You Need to Know

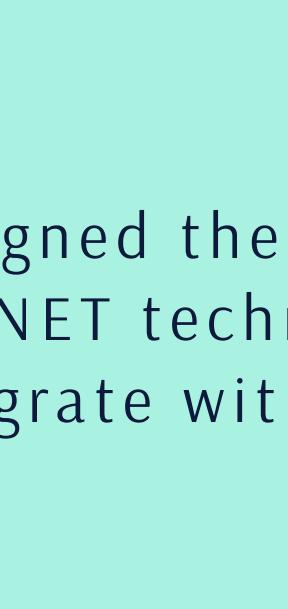

When it comes to the necessities of your site

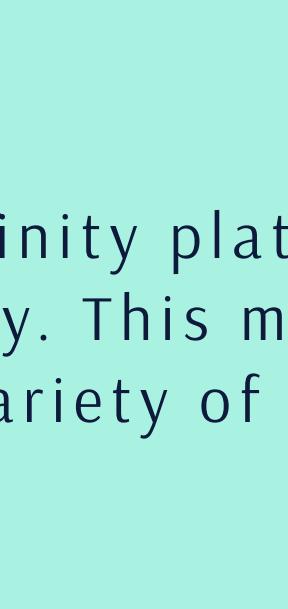

Flexibility

Functionality

Usability

Security

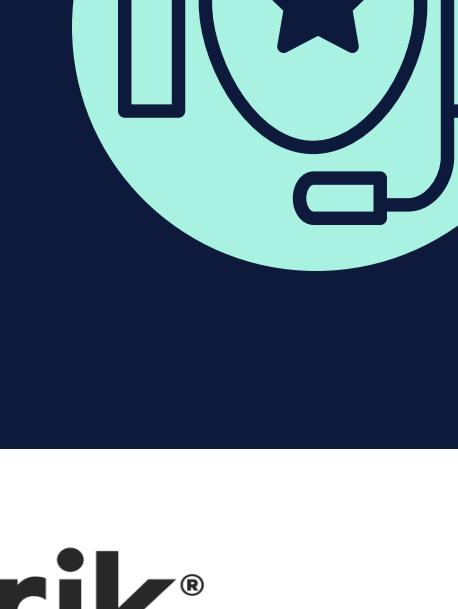

Support

Open Source CMS solutions are highly customizable, but the design and functionality of your site is completely at the whim of your developer.

With a proprietary CMS like Sitefinity, on the other hand, the design of the system can be customized to meet highly specific design without needing a high degree of skill. This way, YOU could make quick changes if desired.

The functionality of a Sitefinity is much more dependable and sophisticated than with an Open Source CMS solution.

Because the Sitefinity owner is invested financially in continuing to improve the product and meet customer demands, the Sitefinity web development team at SMILE media are able to customize the system faster.

Functionality

Usability

Open source CMS applications are designed by technical web developers for like-minded individuals. Unfortunately, many people using these solutions may not have the level of knowledge required to use them with ease.

Sitefinity, on the other hand, tends to be much more intuitive in navigation, functionality and overall usability.

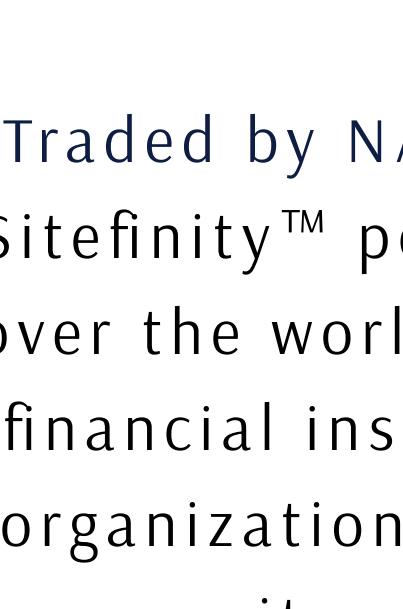

Security

Support

Open source often times can be secure because it's a one-off solution, but also vulnerable because it doesn't have the ears of attention gathered from so many implementations. It's typically at the whim of the developer's skill, and is likely less tested for security.

Sitefinity is secure due to a Telrik's security compliance, which adheres to SOC2. It's been tested and has a mature standard of code. The quality of the code is always updated, made more secure and better.
